Boxer and Woof-Woof, the twin cubs of Buster Bear, fairly shook inside their little black skins as they stared at the herce yellow eyes staring at them from under a big windfall. They were too frightened torun, and arraid to stay. Now, wasn't that a dreadful situation?

They hadn't the least idea whose eyes those were glaring at them, unblinking, ferce, terrible. But they knew that the owner of them had followed them, and they felt that any one who would dare to follow them, the children of Buster and Mother Bear, must be a terrible person. You see, they were used to having nearly everybody run from them, or, at least, keep a safe distance. This was a new experience, and it sent little cold dhills of fear chasing up and down their backbones.

"I want my mother," whimpered Woof-Woof under her breath, and Boxer wanted her, too, though he wouldn't say so. They felt that if only Mother Bear would come all would be well, and there would be nothing to fear.

A stick snapped behind them. The little Bears jumped, and their hearts seemed to come right up in their throats with fright. Could this be another enemy stealing up behind them?

"Woof, woof," said a deep, grumbly, rumbly voice as they turned. Two little squeals answered and two little Bears runshed headlong to meet Mother Bear, for it was she coming to see what they were about. In less time than you could draw a breath those two little Bears were behind Mother Bear and crowfing as close to her as they could get.

Mother Bear stopped. She looked surprised. She sat up and glared all about, and way down in her throat an ugly growl rumbled. She didn't have to be told that those cubs were frightened almost out of their wits and she was looking for the cause. But though she looked and looked she saw nothing to cause them such saw nothing to cause them suc

Dr. Huson said that she never got the money and that the defendants altered the note she had given them to make it appear that she had put up her Long Island property as security for the loan. When the time limit named in the note expired, she said, they got a judgment against her and foreclosed on the property, which, she said, was bought in by Stoll for $7,000 without any notice of the proceedings being given her.

She presented an affidavit by David N. Carvalho, handwriting expert, giving his opinion that the pledge of the property was not made by her. Supreme Court Justice Delehanty, she said, had dismissed the judgment obtained against her and had advised her to have a summons issued for Hochke and Stoll. Magistrate Levine adjourned the hearing.
